

Global Communication Certification

CELEBRATING YOUR PROFESSIONALISM - WORLDWIDE

Communication professionals can now have their skills acknowledged with a global certification. Experienced practitioners can apply to be certified as a Communication Management Professional; the first of a series of designations being developed by the IABC.

Certification is a process whereby your capabilities are assessed and recognized. Widely used in other professions, the certification process tells peers, colleagues and clients that they are working with an experienced and competent communicator.

Certification also shows the world that you are committed to keeping your skills and knowledge up to date.

HOW DO YOU GET CERTIFIED?

Getting certified is actually very simple; there are just three steps:

- Detail your experience, education and skills in an online questionnaire.
- Take a multiple choice test.
- Maintain a record of your learning and personal development.

For the Communication Management Professional certification, you will need to show that you have at least six years of experience in communication. The exam then tests your understanding of common concepts in the areas of:

- Ethics
- Research and analysis
- Strategy and engagement
- Consistency and implementation
- Measurement

In order to maintain your certification you need to keep reading, attending events and thinking about how to improve your practice.

CERTIFICATION MANAGED BY YOUR PEERS

IABC has created The Global Communication Certification Council (GCCC®) with the remit of promoting an internationally recognized standard of communication excellence. Its members are drawn from the ranks of respected professionals around the world.

The GCCC is developing certification levels that acknowledge your knowledge and expertise at different points in your career, starting with the Communication Management Professional (CMP) designation. Other levels are being developed to launch in the next couple of years.
